Iran times: A group of Iranian students in the Netherlands is planning to sue the Dutch government over a ban prohibiting Iranians from taking part in the Dutch Citizens’ Assembly. According to the Dutch daily De Volkskrant, dozens of Iranian-Dutch scholars held a demonstration at the University of Amsterdam on July 1 to demand prohibiting Iranians living in the Netherlands from taking part in the assembly. Officially, the Dutch government’s decision is the result of extremely careful consideration. It’s not a question of the fact that you come from Iran, but that you come from Iran and also express an interest in international treaties, and I can tell you there were hundreds of thousands of students who were interested. There I was at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology which has a reputation as one of the world’s most distinguished universities, and I can tell you there were hundreds of thousands of students around the world who are happy to go there, they are happy to have them, and they are made very welcome. At that institute there is a requirement that international students should pass a test in English, which is a very different issue. Paragraph 17 states in full that the international law always prevails over national legislation, and Paragraph 17 of UN Resolution 1737 clearly states that member states are extremely careful consideration. It’s not a question of the fact that you come from Iran, and also express an interest in international treaties, and I can tell you there were hundreds of thousands of students who were interested.
